

Growing Green Communities Grant Program 2023

Planting trees in your town is a wonderful way to engage your community and share info on the importance of trees for the health and well-being of your families and neighbors. As this is an “incubator” grant, some of you may be new to tree planting – what is most important is to be safe, learn about tree planting, and be sure to water the trees for the first several years – especially because of California’s ongoing drought.

Depending on the local impact COVID may have in your area, in-person and virtual events may be planned. This can include distanced plantings, online engagement, or other COVID-safe activities.

Grantees are expected to develop safe events that engage the public. In your application, you also indicated other areas of focus, including talking with the local press or media outlets, working with schools or elected officials, and online engagement. Here are some parameters and recommendations to make your event a success.

PHOTOGRAPHS

Great photographs will help tell your story and drive support for future events. Here are some tips for getting some great shots:

- If using your phone camera, wipe the lens before taking photos. This is a simple step we often forget, but that can help make much clearer photographs
- Capture all steps of the process: planning meetings caring for trees, kids learning from experts, watering, digging, etc.
- Focus on getting faces in shots and not just capturing folks from behind
- Delegate! You will be busy putting on your event. Asking a volunteer or two to be in charge of capturing photos will help make sure you get some great ones.
- For more tips about photographing tree planting events, watch this webinar from our archives: How to Make Good Photos GREAT!
- Please have your participants sign photo release forms at check-in. Here is an example template.

SOCIAL MEDIA

When you share your events on social media, please tag and recognize your sponsors:

1. PG&E, @PGE
2. US Forest Service, @USForestService
3. CAL FIRE, @CALFIRE
4. California ReLeaf, @CalReLeaf

PRESS

Tree planting events are great for getting press coverage, which helps spread awareness about your organization and about the importance of trees. Many outlets are looking for uplifting and/or meaningful stories! We recommend the community or neighborhood newspapers as being most likely to attend.

Give them details about your event, and let them know if volunteers, kids, and/or elected officials will be there. Local press also likes connecting local events to national news, so you can share how your event relates to a bigger current event or story.

ELECTED OFFICIALS

Community tree planting events are a great time to get local electeds out for a community event. This brings attention to your event, helps draw the press, and is an opportunity to engage decision-makers about the importance of planting and caring for trees. Local electeds can include your city council members, mayor, county supervisors, state and federal senators/representatives/assembly members, and more.

Your event will be appealing to the elected if they know that there will be press, kids, photos, and the opportunity for them to speak. Trees undoubtedly connect to one of their priority areas — such as human health, climate change, education, air quality, and more — so emphasize how attending and speaking at your event gives them a chance to shine the spotlight on one of their key issues.

If your electeds cannot make it, invite their staff! These are powerful people to build relationships with and are often more available for events. They may post it to social media on behalf of the elected, and getting to know them is a good step to getting on your representatives' radar.

SPONSOR ENGAGEMENT & RECOGNITION

Recognition and engagement of PG&E as the sponsor of your event is optional, depending on your organization's sponsor recognition policy. If your policy allows, ways to recognize and engage PG&E could include:

- Engaging with PG&E in order to coordinate Growing Green Communities publicity.

- Offering volunteer opportunities for PG&E personnel.
- Posting their logo on your website.
- Including their logo in your social media
- Recognizing sponsorship in social media post content.
- Thanking them during your tree event.

TREES!

Though the above are all important aspects of tree planting events, the reason for the season is of course, all about trees! Your biggest priority should be getting the right trees in the right place, planted the right way. Please focus on trees that will grow big and to provide shade, while also thriving in your climate. Have a plan for watering and caring for your trees.

Please use the materials provided and resources on our website to ensure a successful tree planting. We can connect you to local experts if you have any other questions. California ReLeaf also hosted a webinar about tree planting and tree care during COVID. You can access that recording here.
